3 THINGS YOU NEED TO KNOW

DRAGHI TO ASK GOVS TO COUNTER BREXIT FALLOUT

I European Central Bank President Mario Draghi is likely to plead for governments to do more to boost the euro zone's economy in the coming week as the fallout of Britain's vote to leave the EU and weaker global growth threaten the bloc's fragile recovery. Governments in China, Japan and Britain have already started easing their fiscal stance or hinted at plans to do so as subpar global growth and inflation show that central banks' ultra-easy monetary policy has run up against its limit. The ECB is not expected to change its monetary stance on Thursday, its last meeting before an eight-week summer break. But a reiteration of Draghi's long-standing call on governments to spend more where possible and speed up growth-boosting reforms is once again likely to fall on deaf ears. The only country with significant fiscal firepower, Germany, is reluctant to give up its budget surplus and has resisted any attempt to pool more money at the European level in the absence of greater power-sharing. "We fear, therefore, that Mr Draghi's calls for a loosening of the purse strings will go unheard, at least for now," economists at BNP Paribas said. REUTERS

MALAYSIA AIRLINES SETTLES DAMAGES

2 Malaysia Airlines has struck a deal to settle damages claims for most victims of its MH17 flight that was shot down over eastern Ukraine two years ago on Sunday, Dutch national broadcaster NOS reported. NOS cited Veeru Mewa, a lawyer representing Dutch victims. Under the Montreal Convention, airlines must pay damages of up to about 130,000 euros ($145,000) to victims' families, regardless of the circumstances of a crash. MH17 was shot down over territory held by pro-Russia separatists, killing all 298 passengers and crew. Most of the passengers were Dutch. REUTERS

TURKEY WIDENS CRACKDOWN ON MILITARY

3 Turkey widened a crackdown on suspected supporters of a failed military coup on Sunday, taking the number of people rounded up in the armed forces and judiciary to 6,000, and the government said it was in full control of the country and economy. Supporters of President Tayyip Erdogan gathered in front of his Istanbul home to call for the plotters to face the death penalty, which Turkey outlawed in 2004 as part of its efforts to join the European Union. We cannot ignore this demand," Erdogan told the chanting crowd. "In democracies, whatever the people say has to happen." Pictures on social media showed detained soldiers stripped from the waist up, some wearing only their underpants, handcuffed and lying packed together on the floor of a sports hall where they were being held in Ankara. One video on Twitter showed detained generals with bruises and bandages. Akin Ozturk, head of the air force until 2015 and identified by three senior officials as one of the suspected masterminds of the coup plot, was among those held. REUTERS

Staying cool will be a challenge for Bostonians and most others in the Northeast with the coming of a long-lasting heat wave this week. GETTY IMAGES

MASSIVE HEAT DOME HEADING EAST

It's been a hot summer for much of the Northeast and mid-Atlantic, with the exception of New England. The I-95 corridor has been generally cooking from D.C. to Philly to New York City, with the unbearable heat and humidity broken only for a few days by strong to severe storms bringing a return to more comfortable humidity levels.

Looking at the latest computer models, a massive dome of pure heat will build across the Midwest over the next few days, producing scorching triple-digit heat.

This massive atmospheric heat dome will shift slowly east through the week, reaching the Northeast by Friday and lasting through next weekend. This should be the hottest and the longest-lasting heat of the summer, with some computer models predicting it will extend through the middle of next week.

Long-range temperature projections have the heat boiling up to 95 to 100 degrees by this weekend and into the first half of next week, meaning very dangerous to life-threatening heat.

Now keep in mind this forecast is still early in the prediction period and we are not locked in on it just yet, but it's something to keep an eye on.

The only exception to the rule will be New England — you're lucking out, Boston, this summer — as weak backdoor cool fronts could put a lid on any excessive prolonged heat, especially in coastal towns.

If you're planning a vacation starting this upcoming weekend, head for the beaches of Long Island, the Capes of New England and for the shores of New Jersey as the Atlantic Ocean will be the cooling saving grace, although even there you will feel the heat, just not as bad.

Boston police body camera pilot program raises privacy questions

The program incorporates recommendations from several privacy and police accountability groups they believe balance privacy with improving department transparency.

CHRIS CAESAR
@MetroBOS
letters@metro.us

A group of 100 Boston police officers will soon volunteer to take part in a six-month pilot program that would explore the use of body cameras by the department, the mayor's office announced last week.

But in a state notorious for its, at times, Byzantine public records law — state officials recently received an “F” from the Center for Public Integrity — how readily will footage obtained in the experiment be made available to the public?

As the nation reels from fatal encounters between police and black men, some videotaped and released online, access to police body camera recordings is seen as crucial by many, who argue it deters misconduct or provides evidence of abuse. Critics, though, point to privacy concerns that could be violated by the camera's unblinking eye.

Last week, North Carolina Gov. Pat McCrory signed a law explicitly exempting such footage from public record laws in the state. For now, no such law exists in the Bay State, meaning video obtained by body cameras is “presumptively” public information, Kade Crockford, who heads the Technology for Liberty Project at the ACLU of Massachusetts, said.

Crockford's organization, along with the Boston NAACP and the Boston Police Camera Action Team, praised the Boston Police Department for incorporating recommendations it felt balanced civilian protection while improving transparency in police interactions with the public.

Those include a requirement officers activate the cameras when engaged in most “potentially adversarial” encounters with the public; privacy protections for those in homes or other sensitive situations with an expectation of privacy; an explicit ban on using the cameras to record civilians based only on their “political or religious beliefs or upon the exercise of the civilians' First Amendment rights;” and a ban on any kind of biometric capabilities in the camera — including face recognition technology.

“We are pretty happy with the privacy protections in the [training program],” Crockford said. “We want to make sure that this is a tool for police monitoring, and not increased surveillance.”

But Crockford said the organization still had a “serious concern” about ensuring public access to the footage: The pilot program would allow officers to review body cam footage before providing their own recollections of an incident to investigators.

“That's our No. 1 problem with the policy,” she said. “If there is an incident where a law enforcement official arrests someone and charges them with say, assaulting an officer — that person is going to be interrogated by the police, presumably, about that alleged infraction, and that defendant isn't going to have the ability to have access to that body-cam footage when they are in custody.”

“But, in terms of privacy” in collecting that footage, Crockford added, “we think the Boston police did a commendable job.”

While the pilot program has no firm start date, it is expected to begin as early as next month, according to The Boston Globe.

After the limited experiment, Police Commissioner William Evans told WGBH he would like to see a broader and more permanent program put into place in the city.

To RNC delegates, it's for the people, by the people

As Republicans arrive in Cleveland, delegates are ready to represent the "will of the people."

ALEXIS SACHDEV
@MetroBOS
letters@metro.us

Calvin Tucker doesn't foresee Republicans hijacking the party convention this week. And even if they do, they won't get his vote.

"I don't expect to support anyone other than the presumptive nominee, who has won against 16 other candidates, who has spent millions of dollars in the quest to become the nominee, who has gotten millions of votes across this country," said Tucker, who will be representing Pennsylvania's 2nd Congressional District as a delegate this week in Cleveland.

"This process, this system is the system under which we live. We understand the rules," Tucker said. "We have to accept the will of the people."

He said he plans to vote for Donald Trump, in part, because of that will.

"Donald Trump is obviously the last man standing," Tucker said, adding that his two guiding principles in determining who to vote for are electability and last man standing. "And electability has to do with the 270 electoral votes that are needed to become the president of the United States. ... I believe, hands down, that he can win the presidential election."

Mark Townsend, a bound delegate representing Massachusetts, echoed Tucker's sentiments.

"It doesn't seem to me that [a contested convention] is going to happen," Townsend, who initially backed Gov. Scott Walker but ran as a Trump delegate, said. "Trump has well more the number of delegates he needs. I always thought the nominee was going to be one of the people who stepped up and ran. ... As delegates it's our responsibility to honor the will of the voters."

Townsend and Tucker will be describing their experiences at the Republican National Convention this week for Metro's online and print editions.

This will be Tucker's second convention; his first was in 2012, representing Tampa, Florida. He was elected in April as one of Pennsylvania's 54 unbound delegates — the largest group of free agents to converge on Cleveland. Unbound delegates are not tethered to a candidate until voting at the convention.

"I have high expectations politically, but I'm a little bit apprehensive as to what confronts me from a security point of view in Cleveland," Tucker wrote in an email. "The emotions that I currently feel is much different than the emotions that I felt in 2012."

"In 2012, my first national or international news media interview was the first night of the convention, but this year I have had well over 25 encounters with such media outlets," Tucker wrote. "What kind of press coverage awaits me in Cleveland? This also adds to the excitement and thrill of being a delegate in the year of Trump."

Trump took Pennsylvania by a landslide in its April 26 GOP primary: He won all 17 delegates, and took 56.7 percent of the vote, compared to Ted Cruz's 12.6 percent.

Tucker's district is a predominantly Democratic one that includes parts of Philadelphia and Montgomery County — Trump won both, too.

Townsend is traveling to Cleveland from a state that, on many levels, has rejected Trump.

Gov. Charlie Baker is skipping the convention, and he's the only Republican governor to publicly reject voting for Trump. Mitt Romney, the party's 2012 presidential nominee and the state's previous Republican governor, has been among Trump's harshest critics, slamming the real estate mogul for not releasing his tax return and calling for another candidate to replace him at a brokered convention.

That said, Trump won 22 of Massachusetts' 42 delegates in its March 1 GOP primary.

Townsend, who represents the state's 9th Congressional District, said he trusts Trump's platform, including his border- and gun-control beliefs.

"I think we've lost our stature around the world," Townsend said. "I think many of our allies no longer have the confidence in us that they used to have. And I'm not sure how Hillary Clinton, carrying on the policies of Barack Obama, will change that."

"I think he's something we need."

UNH offers class on Deflategate this fall

New Englanders: Want to sharpen your skills in defending Tom Brady?

You're in luck, the University of New Hampshire is again this year offering a three-week online class exploring Deflategate and the issues that surrounded it last year.

The class, taught by UNH Law faculty member and Sports Illustrated legal analyst Michael McCann, costs $139 and runs from Sept. 12 to 30.

"The nationally publicized 'Deflategate' case illustrates the power struggle that results when sports and law collide," the course's description reads.

"This online noncredit course...will introduce you to the role the legal system plays in sports, relevant practices and applications in the field, and the journalistic methods used to fuel a scandal that has dominated the professional sports landscape since January of 2015."

Students will spend the time watching video lectures, reading primary documents related to the case and interacting in discussion threads with the professor and fellow classmates.

There won't be any grade inflation, though: Sorry kids, but the course is non-credit.

Plymouth town worker accused of attacking jogger with pruning shears

A recently fired Plymouth Parks Department employee has been arrested on charges related to an attack on a Morton Park jogger.

On Thursday afternoon, police arrived at Morton Park, where they found a female jogger, 39, suffering from multiple stab wounds after she had been assaulted by an attacker wielding pruning shears, WCVB reported.

Police had received numerous calls of a woman screaming in the park, CBS Boston reported, adding that she had been attacked while jogging on a secluded trail and a passerby helped fight off her assailant.

After a search of the area, police arrested 28-year-old Daryl Moyer, a former seasonal Parks Department employee who was later charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, armed assault with intent to murder, armed assault with intent to rape, indecent assault and battery and other related charges, WCVB stated.

Moyer, who was fired from his position after the incident, was ordered held without bail, according to the Boston Herald.

The victim was treated for serious injuries at South Shore Hospital, WCVB added, also reporting that police said other parkgoing members of the public are not in any danger related to the attack.

Gunman kills three police officers in Louisiana; Obama condemns attack

Shooter dies in gun-battle with police; motive unclear.

A gunman killed three police officers and wounded three others in Louisiana's capital on Sunday, just days after the fatal shooting of a black man there sparked nationwide protests, one of which led to the massacre of five Dallas policemen.

The officers in Baton Rouge were responding to a call of a man carrying a gun when shots were fired at around 9 a.m. local time (10 a.m. ET). Two Baton Rouge police officers and one sheriff's deputy were killed.

The suspect, identified by a U.S. official as Gavin Long of Kansas City, Missouri, was believed to have acted alone. Investigators suspect a 911 emergency call may have been used to lure police to the scene, the official said on condition of anonymity.

It was not immediately clear whether there was a link between the shootings and the recent unrest over the police killings of black men in Baton Rouge and Minnesota.

Authorities did not give any information about the gunman's possible motive.

President Barack Obama condemned the "attack on law enforcement in Baton Rouge" and vowed that justice would be done.

"We may not yet know the motives for this attack, but I want to be clear: There is no justification for violence against law enforcement.

None. These attacks are the work of cowards who speak for no one," Obama said in a statement.

Louisiana Gov. John Bel Edwards called the shooting an "unspeakable, heinous attack" that served no purpose.

"There simply is no place for more violence. That doesn't help anyone, it doesn't further the conversation, it doesn't address any injustice, perceived or real. It is just an injustice in and of itself," he said in the press conference.

Obama has sought to balance concerns about police abuses, largely against African-Americans, while paying tribute to fallen officers. He attended a memorial service last week for the five Dallas police officers killed by a black ex-U.S.

soldier at the end of a protest against the fatal police shootings of Alton Sterling in Baton Rouge and Philando Castile in Minnesota.

The Black Lives Matter civil rights movement has called for police to end racial profiling, bringing the issue to national attention ahead of the Nov. 8 U.S. presidential election. Republicans have pushed back, calling for support of the police.

It is a time of especially heightened security across the country, notably in Cleveland and Philadelphia, hosts to this week's Republican National Convention and next week's Democratic National Convention, respectively, which are expected to formally nominate Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton for the election.

"We demand law and order," Trump said in a Facebook posting Sunday afternoon.

The head of a Cleveland police union called on Ohio Gov. John Kasich to declare a state of emergency and suspend laws allowing for the open carry of firearms during the Republican convention.

"I don't care what the legal precedent is. I feel strongly that leadership needs to stand up and defend these police officers," Steve Loomis, president of the Cleveland Police Patrolmen's Association, told Reuters in an interview.

Loomis said he was concerned about copycat shootings at the Republican convention.

A spokeswoman for Kasich said the governor did not have the power to suspend the open carry law.

Sunday's shootings occurred about a mile from the Baton Rouge Police Department headquarters, where dozens of people were arrested this month while protesting Sterling's death. The 37-year-old African-American father of five was shot and killed at close quarters by law enforcement officers on July 5.

A witness to Sunday's shootings, Brady Vancel, told a CBS television affiliate he had seen a gunman, a second man in a red shirt lying in a parking lot and another gunman running away "as shots were being fired back and forth from several guns."

He said the police arrived shortly after the gunfire began.

One of the injured officers was listed in critical condition at Our Lady of the Lake Regional Medical Center, while another was in fair condition, hospital spokeswoman Kelly Zimneman said. The third was taken to another hospital where he was in fair condition.

Shocked community members lined the highway about a mile from the shootings, at the site of the protests against Sterling's killing.

"It never hits home until it's in your own living room," said Redell Norman, an activist who attended the recent protests at police headquarters. REUTERS

Lady Gaga pulled over two weeks after getting a license

Don't worry, Lady Gaga: It happens to the best of us.

Gaga was driving a red Ford pickup truck down the Pacific Coast Highway in Los Angeles when the police pulled her over. The incident occurred just two weeks after the pop singer got her driver's license.

Gaga took to Twitter to confirm the event, telling her fans that she was pulled over because she hasn't received plates for her new car yet. "Ya I got pulled over. Big deal! I just haven't received plates yet for my new pick up!" she wrote.

Two weeks ago, Gaga shared her excitement about getting a license on Instagram: "Thelma and Puhleaaaaze (And yes I FINALLY got my license after years of driving w an adult present and a learners permit) IM FREE Rollin w the homies," the caption reads.

According to TMZ, Gaga's run-in with the police didn't take too long — the incident seemed pretty mild, and it's unclear if she was issued a ticket.

Zayn Malik actually gets a cool tattoo

Zayn Malik's secret is out: He's a Star Wars geek, just like the rest of us.

On Friday, the former One Directioner got a tattoo of a lightsaber on the side of his middle finger. Even cooler, the ink glows a bright blue under UV lights.

Malik's longtime tattoo artist, Jonathan "Jon Boy" Valena, took to Instagram to debut his latest work on the 23-year-old singer. "May the force be with you @zayn #uvink #starwars #jonboytattoo," the caption reads.

Will Gigi Hadid, Malik's girlfriend, be the next star to sport a Jon Boy tattoo? Because we'd love to see one of Hollywood's biggest power couples don matching lightsaber tattoos in the near future.

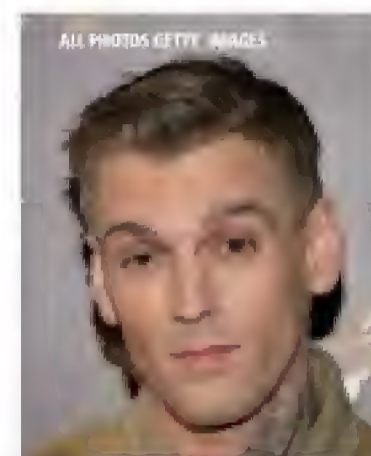

Aaron Carter sued by former employee

It looks like Aaron Carter's party is crashing down on him pretty quickly.

A former employee is seeking $50,000 from Carter, claiming the former child star and brother of Nick Carter, of Backstreet Boy fame, refused to pay him for his work on Carter's website.

In the lawsuit, a man named John Cantu said he had agreed to develop and maintain a website for Carter.

But after requesting payment last month, Cantu claims the 28-year-old singer dismissed him as an "intern" and refused to pay, according to TMZ.

In addition to suing

Carter, Cantu fired back by crashing the website and replacing its contents with a link to his personal Twitter account, urging visitors to "follow a genius" instead. The website is now offline.

Though he has yet to release an official statement, Carter seemed to fire back at Cantu and at the lawsuit via social media: "There is a sufficiency in the world for man's need but not for man's greed. I rest my case," he tweeted on Sunday.

Demi Lovato is hooking up with an MMA fighter

Demi Lovato's new beau is a stone-cold knockout. According to Us Weekly, the 23-year-old singer is now hooking up with MMA pro fighter Guilherme "Bomba" Vaconcelos. The two met while working out at West Hollywood's Unbreakable Performance Center.

Three weeks ago, the Brazilian fighter posted a video of his win during the Bellator MMA tournament on Instagram. In the clip, he receives a warm hug from Lovato, who was sitting in the front row.

Still, don't expect the couple to be getting serious anytime soon — according to sources close to Lovato, the pop star is only trying to have fun and meet new guys after breaking up with Wilmer Valderrama last month.

After six years together, she and the 36-year-old actor released a joint statement about their breakup on Instagram, explaining that they were "better as best friends" and would "always be supportive of one another."

For now, we guess Lovato is just looking to have fun this summer — with a steamy boy toy on hand, of course.

Single and Sweeping

Laurie Davis Edwards is the founder of eFlirt, an online dating concierge service, and the best-selling author of "Love @ First Click: The Ultimate Guide to Online Dating."

How to spot a lazy dating profile

"How do I tell if a match is worth messaging?" is a question I hear often because when you're on a site or an app, you date the matches you pick. If you swipe left or skip over someone, you won't meet them, so how can you judge who's a good match for you based on merely a few sentences and photos?

If you're looking for a relationship, attraction and compatibility should take equal priority when you're viewing matches.

But it's so easy for attraction to take over. I can't tell you how many times I heard a client say they chose a match "because he's attractive." While cute is always a plus, it's more likely a date will be awesome if he or she also piques your interest with their words.

Every profile doesn't have to be a novel, but there's a fine line between keeping things simple and being flat-out lazy. Here are some ways to tell the difference.

They are lazy if they only uploaded one profile photo. Come on, everyone has a smartphone in their pocket these days. Taking profile photos isn't hard.

They're also lazy if their whole profile is generic. If you still don't know anything specific about your match after giving their bio a read, move on to the next. They didn't put any effort into showing you who they are so all you're going off of is photos, which won't guarantee a good date.

Size really doesn't matter. Despite taking a simple approach to their profile, if your match is being distinct and specific with their interests, they have put in the effort that matters. They're still showing you who they are even though there aren't many words on the page. So if you think they're cool, go ahead and say hey. Hopefully, it will lead to your next great date.

If you're bored, they're bored. iStock

Benjamin Bratt finds sympathy for a devil

The actor plays a semi-likable member of Pablo Escobar's drug cartel in "The Infiltrator."

MATT PRIGGE

Benjamin Bratt was a little worried about doing "The Infiltrator." The film recounts one of the largest criminal round-ups in law enforcement history, when a team of federal agents — led by undercover god Robert Mazur (played by Bryan Cranston) — got in deep with a wing of Pablo Escobar's drug cartel. He wound up busting dozens of his employees in one fell swoop.

Bratt plays Roberto Alcaino, one of Escobar's higher-ups, to whom Mazur got so close the two became close friends. Alcaino is still alive and behind bars, and Bratt hopes the ex-drug boss likes his performance.

It's kind of amazing that this hasn't been made into a film already. What I found remarkable when I first read the book was how cinematic it is, almost to the point of unbelieveability. Even the way they capture, arrest and indict the 85-plus criminals at the end, it feels like a movie rather than something that really happened.

They're still alive and well and just as dangerous as they were back in the day. A lot of forethought went into whether it was a smart idea to turn this into a film. That led me to an equally personal consideration in terms of taking this job on. I've had the opportunity in the past to play people who have pre-existed or left some mark on society. But never someone of this class, where the potential fallout if they don't like the performance is pretty grave. [Laughs] It gave me some pause, I must admit.

That said, maybe one reason is because some of those involved are still alive and might not want the story told. That had to be a consideration. To get that deep undercover you're crossing paths with a dangerous class of people, whose reach is long.

You do actually give him humanity, though. He's not a stock villain.

I hope he reads this article and thinks as much. [Laughs] It was the chance to play someone who was multidimensional, very complex and in possession of many qualities I admire personally in a friend or a family member. He's a man of integrity, a man of principle, a man who's discreet and family-oriented, a loving husband — what's not to like about a guy like that?

Of course, the kind of business he's in has a very serious and heavy fallout for those who cross his path. He's using a twisted logic to explain why he does what he does. He has a line where he says, "I could be sweating my balls off working in a restaurant somewhere. But I'm fulfilling a need." It's a question of practicality in his mind, a question of supply and demand. He grabs the American dream, the notion of coming from nothing and rising to something, and twists and turns it to explain what he does.

Another interesting angle is that we may feel sympathy for Roberto. He puts his trust in loyalty into Bob, unaware that Bob will at one point betray him. You could even feel bad for him.

I was surprised by the number of people who had that reaction so powerfully. What it speaks to, whether you're on the right side of the law or the wrong side, is that when we're double-crossed it's hurtful. You see when Bob Mazur is in the courtroom facing the 85-plus families of those indicted. He saw those stares, those looks like laser beams of accusation and hurt and betrayal.

Even though we see a bad guy get betrayed, what we're feeling is when that happens to us. And it doesn't feel good.

Company One looks at transgender life today.

JEREMY D. GOODWIN
jgoodwin@metro.us

Do you like your socially aware theater experiences to come with a dollop of '90s nostalgia? "The T Party" will hook you up.

The play — a collection of scenes about gender identity — is preceded by a simulation of a Gen X high school prom. The audience is invited to get right onstage and dance along. Though this kind of interactive theater is gaining popularity, there's more going on here than an experiment in crowd participation.

"I have friends whose gender expression today is different from what it was in the '90s, and they told me they wanted to go to the prom as this gender in the '90s and they couldn't," says Natsu Onoda Power, the Georgetown University professor who wrote play. "That's why it's a '90s prom, to honor some of my friends."

She built the play, which makes its New England premiere this month at Company One Theatre, on stories that members of the transgender community in Washington, D.C., shared with her. They vary in length and mood, though plenty of the show is very funny.

When it was first performed on the Georgetown campus in 2008, not everyone was pleased. At least one letter writer to the student newspaper complained there was no place on campus for a play like this, Power says.

But since then there's been an extraordinary rise in awareness of these issues.

"In 2016 it actually seems a little quaint and dated. If there's controversy, it's [critics saying] that people are not talking about gender in this way anymore," she says.

When Power brought a transgender speaker to class in 2008, it was the first time many of her students really thought about what that meant and the issues transgender folks face. "Now," she adds, "students are gender-nonconforming, gender-creative and gender-fluid. And each of these terms is also problematic. They carry so much burden, and we're always saying the wrong things."

The best thing to bring to "The T Party" is an open mind, the professor-playwright says.

"Even if something strikes you as incorrect or problematic, one thing that I really want to be clear about is that the words in the play are from real individuals talking about their experiences. It's not presented as the 'correct' view; it's just individuals trying to live their lives and saying the wrong things all the time."

Inmate education is key to success on the outside

Prison-to-college programs give formerly incarcerated individuals a second chance.

ALIZAH SALARIO
@Allirosa
alizah.salario@merc.us

When Devon Simmons started college, he was not a recent high school graduate living on a bucolic campus. He was a prisoner at the Otisville Correctional Facility, a medium security men's institution about two hours from New York City.

"To finally utilize my talents was really a blessing, and in the process I got to learn new things, and look at things from a different perspective," says Simmons, 34, who began his coursework during the 12th year of a 15-year sentence.

Simmons was part of the first cohort of students in the Prison-to-College Pipeline program, an initiative of John Jay College of Criminal Justice and Otisville that began in 2011.

The program is unique in that college credits earned behind bars are transferable, allowing formerly incarcerated individuals to continue their education upon release. CUNY professors are brought in to teach at Otisville, and students in John Jay's criminal-justice students travel to the facility once a month to learn alongside their incarcerated peers, challenging minds and stigmas in equal measure.

"I had a sense of purpose, knowing that out of the hundreds that applied, I was one of the eight people who actually was accepted into the program," says Simmons, who will begin studying at John Jay College in the fall. "Because no one in my family actually went to college, so it gave me an opportunity to rewrite my story."

Soon, 12,000 prisoners across the country will have the opportunity to rewrite their stories too. In June, John Jay was one of 67 institutions nationwide asked to participate in the Second Chance Pell Pilot Program, which makes incarcerated students eligible for federal education funding.

In the Boston area, Mount Wachusett Community College is also part of the pilot program, which represents a major win for criminal-justice reform. In 1994, Congress banned Pell Grants to prisoners.

"There's increasing bipartisan recognition that education in the context of prisons is economically, morally and socially the right thing to do," says Dr. Baz Dreisinger, founding academic director of the Prison-to-College Pipeline and the author of "Incarceration Nations: A Journey to Justice in Prisons Around the World."

Rewriting his story

In 1999, four weeks before graduating from high school, Simmons was charged with first-degree critically about the world beyond prison walls. For one assignment, he wrote about the importance of funding education for incarcerated individuals.

"The truth of the matter is, higher education has proven to be cost-effective in regards to recidivism," says Simmons. "I don't see how society wouldn't embrace that when, ultimately, these are individuals coming back to their community, right?"

Another aspect of the program he's most proud of is its ripple effect.

"I would like people to know how infectious [education in prison] is. It spreads like a disease. I might be the one sitting in the dorm who's actually taking college courses in the facility. When other people in the dorms see me up late at night doing my papers, constantly reading books, they begin to wonder, and with that, they start asking questions and saying, 'Wow, if this guy could do it, maybe I could get my GED, maybe I could engage more in my vocation or trade,' or whatever it is they're doing to better themselves."

assault and sentenced to 15.5 years in prison. In his first decade behind bars, he earned his GED and continued to seek knowledge, learning about the law in pursuit of appealing his case and reading numerous autobiographies, including Malcolm X's, which gave him a sense of motivation and hope.

Even though he'd been out of the classroom for 12 years, Simmons wanted to apply to the Prison-to-College program. To qualify, inmates must have high school diplomas or GEDs, be eligible for release within five years and go through a competitive application process.

The coursework is rigorous, and students are encouraged to think

Sweatworking is next-level networking

Metro editor Alizah Salario tried out the latest workplace trend.

ALIZAH SALARIO
@Alizosa
alizah.salario@metro.us

Some hybrids are unexpectedly delightful (the cronut) while others (bacon-flavored toothpaste) are less inspired. I was recently tasked with a challenge: to find out where sweatworking falls on the continuum of unconventional mergers.

Sweatworking, as its name suggests, is the combination of a physical activity — running, yoga, indoor cycling — with networking. The trend has been touted as a way to strengthen communication, overcome workplace obstacles and avoid the stilted pretences of traditional networking.

Because sweatworking has gone full Tae-Bo in its trendiness, this intrepid (or not) reporter was game. I was drawn to the two-birds-with-one-stone aspect: At the very least, I could get in a run while technically working. It couldn't be that bad — we'd all be in same schvitzzy boat.

My sweatworking event of choice was a 5K run. Chris Heuisler, national RunWestin concierge (the Westin Times Square sponsored the event), compared the trend to a modern day game of golf — you might focus on the green, but a lot of schmoozing happens while riding around in the cart.

In short, I survived. Here's what I learned.

You don't need to be networking while working out

After a group stretch, we set off from the Westin on 43rd and 8th Avenue, running a few harrowing blocks while dodging tourists in the cesspool that is Times Square. The first person I spoke with was a lovely woman who does wholesale marketing for Joe's Coffee.

We didn't need anything to break the ice — talking just felt natural as we kept the same stride. Though I can't call it a legitimate career connection, I promised that if she got Joe's Coffee into my local food co-op, I'd buy it.

Everyone sweats — get over it

By the end, I felt my face turning tomato red. A momentary flash of insecurity hit, but at the next stoplight that didn't stop me from introducing myself to another runner who did social media analytics for large companies. Again, while I can't call it a traditional connection, I learned about social analytics, which inspired me — I'm a journalist who tracks her posts — to be more tech savvy. Together, we huffed toward the finish line.

Ultimately, it's less awkward than standing around drinking

When the official networking began back at the hotel bar, staff passed out towels, fancy cocktails and superfood snacks — nuts, dried fruits, trendy-looking seeds of some sort.

I introduced myself to Alicja Wojczyk — I wanted to connect because I heard she hosted sweatworking events at FlyWheel, where she does PR. Wojczyk noted that consultants from Goldman Sachs and Citibank will often take a FlyWheel class together before work. For them, it's not necessarily a chance to make new connections but to build on the ones they already have.

My takeaway: Getting your heart rate up is a great pregame for networking. People seemed looser, more positive and more at ease. Though I'm not convinced that you're going to make more connections, you'll probably have more fun.

Red Sox need these 3 players to step up during second half

The Red Sox could be getting a bit more from a few key players this summer.

RYAN HANNABLE
@RyanHannable
sports@metro.us

The unofficial second half of the Red Sox' season got underway this past weekend in the Bronx. It was an up-and-down first half of the season for the Sox, but they are firmly in the playoff mix.

From an individual perspective, the team did have a few key members who underperformed in the first half. Here are three players who need to have better second halves for the team to make the postseason.

1 Hanley Ramirez

While he's been much better than anticipated at first base, the bat hasn't been there. Although he heated up in July, the Red Sox need him to hit like that for the rest of the year. The first baseman is batting .288 with eight home runs and 48 RBIs for the season. While those aren't horrible, the Red Sox need him to perform closer to like he has in July — 10-for-20 — over six games. With him batting behind David Ortiz in the lineup, they need Ramirez to be a force so opponents won't pitch around Ortiz all the time.

2 David Price

Like Ramirez, Price improved over the last month or so, but the Red Sox signed him to be an ace and they need him to pitch like one almost every time he takes the mound. Through his first 19 games as a member of the Red Sox, he is 9-6 with a 4.34 ERA, but is coming off an eight-inning shutout against the Rays to end his first half. Since May 7, over his last 12 starts, he has an ERA of 3.14, down almost 2.50 points from two months ago.

3 Koji Uehara

It hasn't been the best of years for the 41-year-old, but the Red Sox need him now more than ever with the injury to closer Craig Kimbrel. Uehara will slide into the closer's role, even with the addition of Brad Ziegler. In 36 appearances, the right-hander has a 4.81 ERA and the big issue has been the number of home runs allowed. Over 33 2/3 innings, he's allowed eight home runs. For the Red Sox to remain in the playoff race, they need Uehara to be better than he's been, and maybe going back to being a closer will help him do that.

Brown among Celtics best at Summer League

They say this is the slowest time of the year for sports, but don't tell that to Celtics fans.

The NBA's summer league is in full bloom, which means the Celtics get their first real look at the newest — and youngest — members of the team, as well as some of their promising youngsters a year or two into their respective NBA careers.

The results have been mixed, as are all summer league sessions, but it's not just about wins and losses. It's a time to gauge how these youngsters jell with one another as they share the court for the first time. It's also a time to see how some have grown after a year in the league.

Here are three players who have stood out during summer league play.

Terry Rozier

Danny Ainge surprised a lot of people last year when he drafted Louisville's Terry Rozier with the No. 16 pick in the NBA Draft. The Celtics were relatively guard heavy, and Rozier was seen as a reach at that point. He contributed sparingly in his rookie season. But after watching him this summer, he looks primed for a bigger role in Year 2. That's good, because with Evan Turner signing with the Portland Trail Blazers, there's an opening. Through six games Rozier been the team's best player, averaging 20.0 points, 5.3 rebounds, and 3.5 assists. He also hit a game-winning three-pointer against the Spurs to cap off a 23-point night.

Jaylen Brown

Have fans stopped booing the Jaylen Brown pick yet? Have they removed their hands from their faces and actually watched the kid play? Hopefully. Brown's summer league didn't start off great. He hyperextended his knee in his first game, missed the next two and returned to go 3-for-19 over the next two games after his return. But Brown's summer league has taken a turn for the better. He got to the line 17 times against the Mavericks and finished with 20 points and 10 rebounds. And in Wednesday's loss to the Cavs, Brown had his best game, going 8-for-16 from the field and 8-for-11 from the line for 25 points and nine rebounds. It's clear that Brown is going to do damage slashing to the basket until that shot falls more consistently.

Abdel Nader

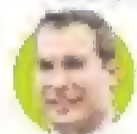

We can't blame you if you were in bed by the time the Celtics chose Abdel Nader with the No. 58 pick in this year's draft. Nader was drafted out of Iowa State after a solid, but not stellar, two years there. But Nader has turned plenty of heads at summer league, oftentimes looking like the most comfortable and NBA-ready player on the court. His stats won't jump off the page — he averaged 10.7 points through seven games — but he does a lot of little things, and saw his role increase as the league went on. JAMES TUSCINO

NBA trade rumors: Celtics to land Russell Westbrook and Blake Griffin?

Danny Ainge and the C's would have to go all out to have any chance at a title in 2016-17.

MATTHEW BURKE
@burke_metro
matthew.burke@metro.us

Danny Ainge is the definition of a go-big-or-go-home GM, so his acquisition of free agent Al Horford and his "so-close-yet-so-far-away" pursuit of Kevin Durant has led many to believe that this is the summer in which he'll push all his chips to the center of the table.

Durant's landing in Golden State has undoubtedly changed the mindsets of GMs across the league and has already created something of a domino effect. Because Durant went to Golden State, Russell Westbrook might be available. Because Durant went to Golden State, previous Western Conference contenders like the Clippers might be waving the white flag.

The Celtics have been linked to both Russell Westbrook and Blake Griffin in trade rumors. GETTY IMAGES

The Celtics have also had to have changed their thinking. For instance, is it still even worth it for Ainge to assemble a superteam this year considering the Warriors most likely already have the Larry O'Brien trophy for the 2016-17 season locked up?

Let's assume for a moment that Ainge will say "screw it" and take the Warriors (and LeBron's Cavs) head on next season. What would it take to at least compete with those teams? Well, it would take a trade for Westbrook (which was rumored Wednesday) and a trade with the Clippers for Blake Griffin (which was rumored Thursday). If the Celtics could somehow hold onto Isaiah Thomas, even better. This would be one legit starting five for Boston:

C Al Horford
PF Blake Griffin
SF Jae Crowder
SG Russell Westbrook
PG Isaiah Thomas

The big issue here is that both Westbrook and Thomas are point guards, but Ainge has long held the belief that positional slots don't matter. Hell, when he was head coach of the Phoenix Suns he put three point guards (Jason Kidd, Kevin Johnson and Steve Nash) on the floor at the same time, with a 2-guard (Rex Chapman) playing "power forward." Having Westbrook and Thomas on the court at the same time would be chaotic, but maybe it would simply be chaotic for the opponent. In a league that has an innovative trend pop up every other season, who's to say a midget backcourt of Westbrook and Thomas would not work?

As for what it would take to get both Griffin and Westbrook to Boston without giving up Crowder and Thomas? It would take, well, everything. All the remaining Nets picks, Jaylen Brown, Avery Bradley, Marcus Smart, Kelly Olynyk, future Celtics first-round picks and anything else the Clippers and Thunder would want.

There's also that small detail of retaining both Westbrook and Griffin after this coming season. It would be one of the greatest gambles in the history of organized North American sports if Ainge went ahead and made those moves.

Aries Don't make assumptions. You are better off doing a job right the first time, even if it requires you to solicit input from others. Romance will ease your stress.

Taurus Tread carefully. You may have an opportunity to do or learn something new, but don't neglect your domestic duties or you will be faced with a personal dilemma.

Gemini Don't jump into something just because others do. Have a mind of your own and don't overspend or indulge just to fit in with the group. Put your faith in facts, not in your friends.

Cancer It's not worth letting a co-worker or colleague get to you. Stay calm and take care of your responsibilities. It's what you accomplish that counts.

Leo Enthusiasm takes you a long way when you are dealing with friends and people with goals similar to yours. Exercise and a healthy diet will bring excellent results.

Virgo Express your feelings and share your ideas and plans. Not everyone will come on-board, but at least you'll know who is with you and who isn't.

Libra Get out with friends or someone you enjoy working alongside. Your accomplishments will result in greater stability. Get moving. Romance is in the stars.

Scorpio Choose wisely with whom you share your thoughts, ideas and plans. Not everyone will see things your way. You need to prepare before you make your feelings known.

Sagittarius You need to work to improve your financial, emotional and physical positions. Find out what's required of you to turn a negative into a positive, and keep whatever you do simple.

Capricorn Share your thoughts and guide those around you to make wise choices. Your input will help you gain respect and appreciation. Close a deal, negotiate or take on a new project.

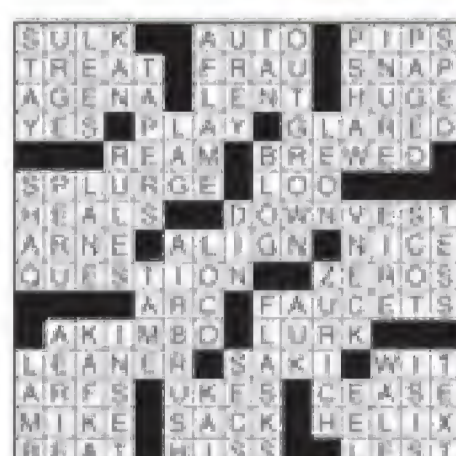

Aquarius If you have a job to do, get it out of the way. Complaints will be made if you aren't up to date or in the know regarding what's expected of you.

Pisces Your power of persuasion will help you get your way, but once you do, make sure you can deliver on the promises. If you give it your all, you'll get a high return. EUGENIA LAST
